The attack comes after weeks of strident statements by the North, including its threat to attack the conference with “the original form of nuclear weapons”. Speculation has long run high that North Korea is planning to send a man into space. But the latest Pyongyang statements have been considered as more ominous, raising fears that the rocket launch could be aimed at the three-day Hiroshima Medical Summit, which opens on Thursday, or even at the three-day meeting of the IAEA, which closes the same day. The association is still trying to establish what the North means by the threat, as the two conferences overlap, but it is not ruling out the possibility that the rocket launch could be the first step to a wider nuclear program. Related Articles “If they're going to attack the Hiroshima conference, it's most likely on May 15, because it falls in between the three-day Hiroshima conference and the three-day IAEA conference,” the association
